Editors Dispatch: There is no surer test of city growth than the legislation it adopts respecting its animals. The country village divides its privileges with all the hogs, sheep, goats, cows, and mules owned by the inhabitants; and in proportion to its poverty and stagnation is the liberality of its partnership with the brutes. As it advances in thrift and population it banishes these dirty marauders from the streets one by one, until by the time it attains the dimensions of a city they are all relegated to their several masters' enclosures, and their predations upon the general public prohibited. mond furnishes a curious exception to this rule, and either for want of ordinances or We referred to the commencement of the in default of their proper execution she difficulty, when Poindexter went down af- treats her four-footed denizens with a genter Curtis. I said that | nating the law against them for straying at night, when respectable cows are, of course, in bed. Would it not be better, if the cows really need the liberty of the streets for their health or comfort, to allow us the daytime and the cows the night? As to the goats, as in the case of the cows, there is an ordinance which promises well but pans out miserably. Every one knows the mischief of these beasts, and they are accordingly the subject of legislative attention; but from the operation of the law all goats are excepted which a doctor will certify as needful for the supply of milk; and such is the generosity of the doctors in this respect that our streets are overrun with licensed goats, irrespective of age, sex, or previous condition. Maybe the fifteenth amendment applies. Meanwhile our streets are defiled, children and women are put in peril, shrubbery and flowers are trampled and torn,
